Grief counseling sits at one of the most ethically complicated intersections in clinical practice. Confidentiality can outlive the client. Your own emotions become part of the room. And the "right" answer often depends on culture, spirituality, and a client's individual relationship to loss. This training gives you a practical decision-making framework for those gray areas, grounded in professional competence, self-awareness, and cultural humility, while also digging into the parts of grief work that are evolving fast enough to catch even experienced clinicians off guard. This is an in-person session built for real clinical practice, not just theory, but the actual dilemmas you'll face in the room.
